Introduction

In the 1860s three courts prosecuted crime beyond the justice of the peace level of adjudication in Warren County. Traditionally, Mississippi relied on a network of justices of the peace to maintain order. These justices could order the imprisonment of persons charged with serious felonies and set bail for those accused of less serious crimes. Those imprisoned or recognized by justices had to wait for the next circuit court session, often months after the offense. In Mississippi circuit courts visited counties twice a year, in Warren County this happened in June and December. And even after reaching circuit court, a defendant had no guarantee his case would be brought to a swift conclusion. Quite the contrary, officials continued most cases from one session to the next. Most never came to trial.

At least by 1860 Vicksburg had already found this circuit system inadequate to its needs. An urban environment, with numerous unguarded warehouses, a large transient population that included a number of loosely supervised slaves, Vicksburgers petitioned the legislature for a second court to handle the caseload. In 1860 Mississippi lawmakers created a criminal court for Warren County which functioned as a second circuit court, meeting four times a year, in February, May, August, and November.<sup>1</sup> Thus six months of the year some Warren County court heard criminal cases.

In November 1865 Mississippi lawmakers decided to create a county court system for the entire state. Although historians have almost entirely ignored the creation of this new system of courts,<sup>2</sup> legislators created them simultaneous with the black code and clearly intended the new courts to restore order after dislocations of the Civil War.<sup>3</sup> The county courts met monthly, to mete out the kind of immediate justice whites assumed the situation required. The county courts followed the same rules as circuit courts, and enforced the same laws. But lawmakers provided important shortcuts designed to facilitate crime control. Malefactors could be brought to justice without going before a grand jury. Reformers had long advocated abolishing grand juries in the name of greater efficiency<sup>4</sup> and in 1865 white Mississippians clearly wanted efficient justice. In the county courts prosecuting attorneys and even county court clerks initiated prosecutions by means of an "information." Informations resembled grand jury indictments in that they accused some defendant of some crime. Prosecuting attorneys wrote both informations and indictments.

Mississippi's county court law also sharply limited the possibility of appeal. Defendants brought into county court could choose trial by jury or trial by judge. Those choosing trial by jury foreclosed all hope of appeal. Those choosing trial by judge could appeal their conviction to the circuit court, but no further. Lawmakers allowed no bill of exceptions. Thus county courts created a record, but one insufficient for appeals. Without a bill of exceptions, there would be no transcript of testimony or judges instructions. Thus when county court cases did reach Mississippi's High Court of Errors and Appeals, the justices ruled they had no jurisdiction.<sup>5</sup>

The records herein inventoried come from the circuit court, the criminal court, and the county court in Warren County. All of these records were retrieved from the attic of the Old Court House Museum for cleaning and filing. There were in no particular order in the attic.

They are now organized by date of indictment or information. Unfortunately, many files have yet to be recovered. Thus, one can not say that all the indictments and informations returned or initiated at a given term have been filed. Additional files will undoubtedly turn up in the future.

This project has been funded by a grant from the American Bar Association.
